I see a lot of sites running on Rails that are much slower than some of the Rails sites I used to work with, purely due to performance issues in the framework. The Ruby and Rails culture of simply over-engineering things is getting tiresome and I'm glad they are taking steps to fix this. --- dmor a totally agreed the culture, it is amazing when you go back to the old school (as an OO fan) and everyone just worries about small details, making things easier yet nobody pays attention to readability, cache, speed and performance. It was kind of a concept that the old ways that's fast to write, yet rarely performant and easy to shoot yourself in the foot. ----- dmor an alternative to the common 'tweak' way of improving performance which is: 1) just go into production and wait for the users ;-) 2) and maintain or even increase the size of the bugs you have (as most of the performance issues are in the non-functional code) ----- dmor python will probably be my go to language for anything web because of my love for better OO It's old news that the White House is working on a plan to cut the U.S. military budget by roughly $10 billion over the

A: Your code has an unbalanced parenthesis in your shell line: stringLine=$(echo "$line" | awk '{print $1}' | awk '{print $2}' | grep -Eo "(.+(.(.+)|\|)?|\|)") This parenthesis is missing on the " | grep -Eo". So this is what happens: line | grep -Eo "(.+(.(.+)|\|)?|\|)" StringLine: This is the problem: the process split the line line on spaces and save them to the variable $line. The first part of this expression has only one capture group, because it is a sequence of one or more characters. That means that only the first parenthesis is captured into $1. AWK: this expression is like your first AWK except for the second AWK. echo "$line" | awk '{print $1}' | awk '{print $2}' Output: This is what happens: 1 2 So when you call grep with a third awk, the only thing that it captures is 1 into $1, and nothing more since $2 is still empty. Finally the last awk captures / into $1 and ? into $2. So when you call grep with a fourth awk, you get |(.(.+)|\|) And into $1 you have 1 2 4. Solution: stringLine=$(echo "$line" | awk '{print $1}' | awk '{print $2}' | grep -Eo "(.+(.(.+)|\|)?|\|)") 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to hearing aids and more specifically to a magnet for positioning the receiver plate of a hearing aid. 2. Description of the Prior Art FIG. 1 shows a conventional hearing aid that is located within a human ear. The hearing aid 100 includes a receiver housing 101, a sound tube 102 (generally a tube with a flared open end), and a receiver plate 103. The receiver housing 101 is located in the ear canal and receives sound vibrations. The receiver plate 103 fits into the receiver housing 101. The receiver plate 103 has a magnet that attracts the 50b96ab0b6

Hepatocyte growth factor (HGF) can stimulate DNA synthesis, an early step in hepatocyte regeneration. HGF is reported to stimulate protein kinase C (PKC) in glial cells, and PKC in turn induces the activation of extracellular signal-regulated kinase (ERK). However, little is known about the roles of PKC in the HGF-induced events in hepatocytes. To investigate the role of PKC in HGF-mediated signal transduction and growth stimulation in hepatocytes, primary cultured hepatocytes were prepared from mice that were deficient in PKCdelta (PKC-delta-deficient mice) or with a heterozygous mutation of PKCdelta and were stimulated with HGF. The growth stimulation with HGF was completely lost in PKC-delta-deficient hepatocytes, indicating that HGF-mediated stimulation of DNA synthesis in hepatocytes requires PKCdelta. The loss of the HGF-induced signal in the mutant hepatocytes was accompanied by a complete loss of phosphorylation of ERK and Akt, and the
