VCL (Visual Component Library) provides high-level interfaces for development of plugins to Microsoft Visual Studio based applications. This version of VCL is based on.NET Framework. Accessing Data Center facilities is needed for a number of operations, ranging from accessing enterprise storage facilities to security applications. In addition to the traditional technologies available at the data center, virtualization and cloud computing have made computing a little more different. The typical enterprise storage facilities include SANs and NAS. Those devices are often used to store data from the operating systems, which are the hosts for virtual machines. Virtualization, especially with the help of cloud computing, has extended their use to have a role in hosting virtual machines. It is even possible to add storage features as a part of virtualization, particularly with the help of VMware and Hyper-V. The Internet has made life a little easier for businesses to make business contacts and to share ideas. Nowadays, it is possible to have web sites that handle the organizational functions of the business. Most of those sites are maintained by small organizations, however. Some of them are large and have an organization design that integrates business operations with IT. The back-end web services that support those applications, such as content management, could be hosted on a data center. The virtualization of storage resources is a little more complicated. The operation of the virtual storage facilities would be centralized and managed. The virtual storage facilities would have storage protocols that are compatible with the storage protocols that would host the virtual machines. Virtual Storage appliances using VMware's VSA could have better management facilities and scalability. However, they do take up more hardware resources because of the virtualization. The additional processing power could be handled as a part of a virtual machine if it is virtualized.Q: Type mismatch when using Debug.Print in VBA (Microsoft Access) I'm new to VBA, and I tried to debug using the debugger in Microsoft Access 2010, but whenever I am using the Debug.Print command, it generates the error of the following form: You can see the "One" and "Two" variables in this screenshot, as well as other selected values.
